Osteoarthritis in Pets

Abby Robertson BVSc - Veterinary Centre Oamaru

The weather is starting to turn colder and like us, animals will start to feel the 'cold in their bones' after the reprieve of the warmer summer months.

What is Osteoarthritis? It is a progressive disease of the joints. Although most people think of osteoarthritis as a disease of bone, it's really a disease of cartilage. Normal cartilage is in a constant state of deterioration and repair. In the case of arthritis, factors such as breed, obesity, dysplasia, or trauma, worsens the deterioration leading to cartilage loss and inflammation, which gives rise to the clinical signs of pain. Although normally associated with old age, arthritis can even be found relatively commonly in young animals.

What are your dog's signs? Canine arthritis can often be misinterpreted as the normal signs of getting old, with ...

- Lameness
- Difficulty standing
- Reduced ability to play or walk
- Reluctance to jump
- Increased irritability
- Not wanting to be stroked/patted

What are your cat's signs? Unlike dogs, cats often have disease in multiple joints, meaning that they don't favour one side or the other because everything hurts! Although diagnosis is challenging, there are clinical signs owners can look for, almost all the signs are tied to behaviour changes ...

- Not wanting to/having difficulty jumping.
- Reluctance to go up or down stairs
- Decreased interactions with owners or other animals
- Increased irritability
- Not wanting to be stroked/brushed
- Elimination accidents – difficulty getting in or out of the litterbox
- Sudden vocalisation and running away for no apparent reason

Also, cats tend to mask the signs of pain as a defensive tactic, so it is important for owners to regard any behaviour changes as a potential sign of disease and get it checked out.

How can we treat Osteoarthritis? While there is no cure for osteoarthritis, there are numerous treatment options available that help to reduce pain and support joint health and longevity. Treatment involves considering all the factors of weight management, pain relief, joint support, environmental modification, and physical therapy holistically. Also, the best outcomes are achieved, when support is started as early in the course of the disease as possible.
